1. A • _Photoshop Elements is a feature-set similar to Photoshop but is based on the vector-based page layout of Adobe Illustrator, with some image editing capabilities for a limited set of tools. 2. B • _Photoshop has three basic tools that are used for all image manipulation tasks—Layer, Fill, and Adjustment. 3. C • _Photoshop allows for selection with the Lasso tool and some inversion abilities with the Magic Wand. 4. D • _Depending on the types of changes or filters applied to the photo, you may have to go back and adjust a photo with previous versions of the filter to see how it compares to this version. Once you're familiar with the basic tools, as shown in the following sections, you can begin to manipulate your image.

Using the Layers Panel When you open an image and import it into Photoshop, it is grouped and stored in a single, monolithic layer. Your image now becomes part of a single large collection of layers that Photoshop makes available for your editing. To add a new layer, click the Layers icon in the lower-left area of the layer window, shown in Figure 7-1. Click a blank area of the canvas to create a new layer for editing. Figure 7-1. To access the Layers palette and the new layer you just created, click the Layers icon at the bottom-left of the workspace. When you create a new layer, Photoshop automatically applies a new name to it. The names that you give to a layer contain information that is useful to you. Remember that layer names are alphanumeric, and you can use punctuation characters, including hyphens, but don't use a space in a layer name. The following image illustrates the layer panel with two layers, each with a descriptive and unique name: If you accidentally select the wrong layer, you can delete it by highlighting the layer and choosing Layer > Remove Layer. To remove the highlighted layer, highlight the layer and press the Delete key. (You can also select the highlighted layer and choose Edit > Clear Layer. You can choose a different layer from the selection in the Layers panel to remove.) 1. 1 In the Layers palette, at the bottom of the workspace, click the New Layer icon to add

The Food and Drug Administration, on Jan. 15, 2020, proposed a ban on the most widely used nicotine e-cigarette product in the United States. While some states and some employers have approved their use, it will now be prohibited for all but a few situations. The FDA based its action on the Surgeon General's advisory committee. The advisory committee, issued in December 2018, reported that the electronic nicotine delivery products (ENDS) may pose a number of health risks to youth, including the possibility of addiction, as well as problems with ENDS' battery power, product usage, component quality, manufacturing practices, and the vaping device market. The committee also reported that the low emission of toxic chemicals in e-cigarettes was a critical consideration in this approval process. The restriction will not apply to other nicotine products or to these companies' other products, which are not covered by this policy. The proposed policy was based on a review of the organization's literature and data. FDA's proposed policy does not ban e-cigarettes, but it does recommend that they be kept away from children and adolescents, that they be used only in locations where traditional cigarettes are prohibited, and that they be sold only in stores that are fully compliant with their state of residence and all applicable federal laws. The proposed policy also limits sales of these products to adults who will be legally eligible to buy tobacco products under these laws. When deciding how to set the policy, FDA had to consider multiple important questions, including: 1) the risks and benefits of these products; 2) the benefits that these products may provide for adult smokers who use them to quit, stop, or cut down on their tobacco consumption; 3) whether the products are consumer-acceptable and user-friendly; 4) the dangers of e-cigarettes, particularly those that contain nicotine; and 5) public health and public safety issues, such as whether these products could be used to "divert" kids away from cigarette smoking. Finally, as always, FDA also evaluated the need for the proposed action. The proposed policy serves the protection of the public's health by addressing the risks posed by the use of ENDS that contain nicotine and by protecting children and adolescents from using these products. FDA also believes that the proposed policy is necessary for other reasons, such as avoiding interference with its regulatory authority, or because there is only a limited scientific understanding of the risks associated with these products. If the proposed ban
