The code of the method is: -(void) doSomething: (id) object { if([object isKindOfClass: [object class]]) { [object performSelector: @selector(doSomething)]; } else { [[object class] performSelector: @selector(doSomething)]; } } I am using iOS 4.2. Does anybody have any idea why they are using [object class] instead of object to get the class of the object and this syntax autorelease and why? A: it's because "autorelease" won't work on a class name. It should be replaced with [object class] or some other explicit reference to the object's class. A: In case of a call on a class instance, the class is copied to the caller and retained (if you call retain, you don't need the [autorelease] in the caller). If the caller is deallocated, the class instance is also deallocated. So there is no point in autoreleasing it. The effect is that you do not need to call [object release], so that [object autorelease] is unnecessary. It also makes sense to call [object release] if the caller itself is [autorelease]. So it is legal to chain method calls: [object doSomething]; [object doSomething]; [object doSomething]; In the second [object doSomething], there is no other object (apart from [object self]) to retain the class of the first [object doSomething] (it only has to retain the class of the second [object doSomething] to be able to copy it) and to deallocate it (so there is no need to release it, because it will be deallocated anyway when
