

represent the band. In early 1998, they recorded their first full album with the legendary English producer/engineer Terry Brown and released the cassette Sounds From the Six Solitudes (a.k.a. Dance With the DRE) in the middle of the year. It was unique in that each member designed the booklet cover independently, and the production used the traditional electric acoustic process of recording and mixing in an old BBC custom recording studio in Telford, England (which the residents nicknamed "The Beach"). This album is highly prized by collectors. On the strength of that, they began working on their next album, an album that was the combination of their unique musical style and the current styles in London's West End, which served as their inspiration. According to the band members, while having been raised in the more traditional Ausabian way in Southern Australia and having formed most of their musical influences from musicians still living in their native country, England was where the band found inspiration and their palette with which to describe the world. Despite their nascent stage, they obtained national and international attention with the release of the title track off their second album in mid-2000. "Somebody's World", featuring Chrissie Hynde, was released to U.S. radio
