The little things I love about blogging and the internet are like little aha's in my life. I'm also finding that it's changed my approach to blogging too. I blog for other people. It's become more than a love of doing it for me. It's also become a way to express my creativity. I used to use my blog more as a diary - probably because it was the only thing I had to keep my secrets in. But it's become much more than that. It's become a creative outlet for me and in turn, I can't imagine not keeping it as an outlet for others as well. However, I have a confession to make. I have not done any of the sponsored posts as I was so nervous when I started. I had to do the New Year's resolution to do them all and have done them all so far. I have also recently gotten a part time job (which I hope will develop into a full time job), and I'd love to do some of them then. However, I can't imagine paying for the products if it's only to promote my blog, so that's why I'm nervous. So to anyone reading this, if you happen to read this, please have a look at my first few sponsored posts. My first one is with a new face mask I've discovered on Youtube called the Instant Nourishing Mask. It's a great mask which makes your skin instantly look and feel nourished and rejuvenated. The second one is a make up tutorial with the eyeshadow palette I bought

The technology can get the job done - and the consistency of design features - but what about the tasks? How can the software support the demands of the business? Here's what Mark McKenna, an expert on design industry trends and the author of "Rethinking Mechanical Design", thinks about design automation in AutoCAD: "AutoCAD is like an oven. It's a relatively low-cost but high-quality oven that has been around for a long time. If you are concerned with baking a piece of pie, you can take it out of the oven, and it will probably be ready for the next person. You don't need to test it because it's been done before. It can be made to do things that were never even envisioned. The next generation of CAD doesn't need to be tested because we know it can do the job. The question is, does it have the right tool? "It seems to me that part of the challenge in design automation is not being able to leverage the enormous investment that has been made by companies like AutoCAD. AutoCAD will continue to provide very powerful capabilities, but the quality of the tools should have more of a focus.
