What's new:

Post navigation Greetings from the town of Carbondale, Colorado, United States of America, where I'm finding myself actually having fun with video games. It's a month long weekend here, which means I have plenty of time to replay games I'd picked up a month ago and train myself up with new ones to play at the next opportunity. Last night I'd scheduled a 10 minute Unity demo for after church. I haven't played a lot of this game for quite some time, but there's just something about Duke & Company that I can't keep away from. The latest version of the game, 1.04, came out not too long ago, having revolutionized what's possible in urban combat. I wanted to reinstall it and see what it'd be like since last I played, a good year ago now. Let's see if Humble Bundle (I think) has a deal running for it at the moment. Maybe I can snag one for the little bit of money it'll be. It'd be worth it. First impressions are amazing. The bullet time effect in the demo is great, with no wasted frames as the camera freezes momentarily, yet the game bursts with adrenaline and sense of urgency as if it mattered. I went for the instant action option, which works in a fun way. It didn't take long before there were two mercs knocked out on the floor, dead. The game's own spec ops is apparently the way to go, and so here I am with some heavy armor, which constantly sounds like explosions in the background when I'm standing still. One of the characters coughs out a blood-streaked death mask of a face and ejects his final breath. I tried a few different play styles, which also mean different classes, each with their own abilities and weapons. Options such as switching ammunition on the fly, flat out getting into a fight while completely ignored, or leaping at an enemy to stab them with the M4 replica. The variation is fascinating and fun, but never forcing us to try too hard. It's gotta be fun and easy if it's going to work. Look: I'm going back to this. The code's gorgeous and well-documented, the vector engine is powerful and well-thought, with the presentation
