It's been a good three years since the Lakers put the exclamation point on their last title with a 108-win run that was crowned by a then-16-year-old Pau Gasol's basket with five seconds left in Game 6 of the Finals. However, since that run, the Lakers have struggled. They won the draft lottery and drafted Julius Randle, yet they've settled into a traditional middle-of-the-pack playoff position. Now, in an offseason where L.A. has the opportunity to roll out a younger-looking roster that could include Randle, Jordan Clarkson and Robert Sacre, there are some who are optimistic about the future of the franchise. When I asked ballerati at the 2013 Toronto Rising Stars, most had a pessimistic outlook on the Lakers' prospects. Here's what they told me: ESPN's Kupchak hit me with this: "The problem with the Lakers has not only been a lack of talent, it has been a lack of discipline and execution. They have been the one team in the last four years that has managed to maintain their level of play without a superstar in their roster. They do all they can to protect Kobe, which is laudable, and yet it still hasn't been enough to get them back on track." Jackson made a pretty convincing argument in a recent interview. "If we had more talent, we would have a better record.... But the fact that we haven't changed as a group doesn't change the fact that the game has changed, and in terms of a lot of things, we're a little bit better, but it's not nearly good enough," Jackson said. "So if we're going to stay out there and fight and try to be OK, then we can't change very much as a group." That's generally good advice, but it doesn't account for the fact that talent is hardly the only ingredient necessary to build a championship team. In that same Rising Stars podcast, I talked with L.A. native and popular basketball blogger Chingy, who not only agreed with Kupchak, but told me that if he could add one former Laker to his current group of six, that
