atherosclerotic plaques, which may be located in the inner lining of arterial blood vessels or in the heart. Substantial medical resources are expended to detect, treat, prevent, or at least delay the onset of atherosclerosis, particularly atherosclerosis in the coronary and peripheral circulations. Early evidence of atherosclerosis includes a “lipid profile,” including measurements of low levels of high density lipoprotein (HDL) cholesterol, high levels of low density lipoprotein (LDL) cholesterol, and/or triglycerides, and high levels of small dense low density lipoprotein (LDL) cholesterol, very low density lipoprotein (VLDL), and intermediate density lipoprotein (IDL). More advanced evidence of atherosclerosis includes the formation of coronary atherosclerotic plaques and heart attacks. High-risk individuals for atherosclerosis include diabetic patients who require insulin or otherwise have a genetic predisposition to diabetes, and smokers, patients who suffer from hypertension, and patients who have other vascular diseases, and the like. Current treatments for atherosclerosis may include controlling blood pressure, blood lipids, and the like.

Presynaptic modulation of neuromuscular transmission in anaesthetized rats. A new method for quantitative study of presynaptic modulation is described. Lumbar nerve-evoked responses of the soleus muscle evoked by nerve stimulation were simultaneously recorded in freely moving decerebrate, unanaesthetized rats, after section of the postganglionic sympathetic neurites (T12 to L4) and of the preganglionic sacral processes (S3 to S5). The short latency sympathetic reflex was suppressed, whereas an increase in the amplitude of the slow waves of the postexcitatory potentials (LEPPs) and monosynaptic excitatory postsynaptic potentials (EPSPs) and a decrease in their threshold was observed. Stimulation of the preganglionic processes was accompanied by an increase in the threshold of the postganglionic reflex, but the response was considerably enhanced. The results were compared with those obtained in previous experiments on anaesthetized rats and suggest that the methods are useful for quantitative analysis of presynaptic modulation of synaptic transmission. Neuropsychiatric manifestations of AIDS: amyloidosis, the differential diagnosis, and drug-induced encephalopathy. A major cause of death in patients with AIDS is related to the neuropsychiatric complications of HIV infection. Three illnesses resulting in impaired concentration, memory loss and other psychomotor deficits are particular concerns to clinicians: HIV encephalopathy, an opportunistic central nervous system infection by the protozoan Toxoplasma gondii; HIV dementia; and a disease caused by deposition
