It is about a study by Professor Colin Blakemore and his team, who have spent the last 18 months using the latest imaging and brain-mapping techniques to examine the brains of nearly 60 volunteers, including members of the general public, some of whom have autism. The results show that the brains of 'intelligent designers', such as Steven Spielberg and JK Rowling, are quite different from the brains of people with some neurological disorders, such as Asperger's syndrome. They also reveal that the brains of designers do not show any significant alterations compared to those of people who are not designers. This is likely to greatly undermine the belief that the human brain is designed for an intelligence. "The main thing we found is that if you look at a human brain you don't see anything that is significantly different to the brains of people who don't design. They are not different. They are not different in any way that is measurable," says Professor Blakemore, a neuroscientist at University College London. "We have set out the case that the human brain is essentially designed to be a designer. It is not designed to be intelligent. There are design solutions for intelligent agency but the human brain is not one of them. There
