Unfortunately for the Boss and his fans, that's exactly what seems to be happening; if it's not like him, it doesn't seem to matter. With "Hall of Fame" out now, The Boss will once again be on the road; and there's a special treat for his fans in the show. After playing The Roxy in Hollywood on Thursday, he'll be back on the road on Friday playing The Auditorium Theatre in Chicago. But before that, on Tuesday night in Pittsburgh, he'll be bringing his "Stray Cat Struts" tour to the Stage AE, where he'll be performing "I'd Love a Saint" and "Blown Away" in addition to "Dancing in the Dark" and, if he needs a breather, "Twist and Shout." He wasn't kidding about his Stray Cat Struts; he's been sporting them all over the place: that jacket of his is totally decked out in red and white just like the famous Jersey Shore Route 37 jacket. So if clustering (pam). Given my data and the choice of distance metric I have a total of  $2^{500}$  possible clusters. I understand that the number of clusters is fixed with agglomerative clustering methods. I am interested in know at what number of clusters should I stop the clustering process in order not to get a too big number of clusters that do not make sense. To be more specific, my goal is to get as small number of clusters as possible while maintaining a reasonable cluster integrity. As a side note, I found this article that tells me to use the number of natural clusters in my dataset to find a good stopping point, but I would prefer to have a general method to choose an optimal number of clusters.

Any help would be much appreciated! A: I would recommend using the "consensus" consensus clustering method, which has a built-in way of choosing the optimal number
