Audition You can't edit images if you don't have them. And with digital cameras not being able to easily transfer images to your computer, you need a backup. Another problem is that the digital media in your camera will not be protected with those magnetic strips like you found on film negatives, so you need to be able to copy those images to a backup disc on a regular basis. For editing, you need a recorder that will also play the images back. Audition (www.adobe.com/products/audition/) is a popular software program for the Mac. It has many image and audio file-editing tools. For example, it supports multi-image editing, such as compositing, video, vector graphics, and drawing. You can also scan and edit digital camera images, and add audio to video files.

going to be giving you an in-depth comparison between all of them, but I'm just going to name my top two and if there's one you think you're going to use, go ahead and give it a try. What's the difference between a Photoshop alternative and a Photoshop clone? Well, if you install a Photoshop alternative, you're going to get the same Photoshop features but with a different user interface. These are often less customizable, making them less suitable for professional use. On the other hand, Photoshop clones are stripped-down programs designed to mimic Adobe Photoshop, often with little to no customization options. They may not include all of the same features and you may have to buy a Photoshop upgrade to get the features you want. We've put together a list of Photoshop alternatives that you should consider. Free and Open Source Photoshop alternatives These Photoshop alternatives are free and open source. Cameroon's Anglophone regions protest, saying they're unable to get basic services like power and water. Residents of two of Cameroon's English-speaking regions on Sunday staged protests in the streets to demand greater autonomy as their president disputed a planned referendum that could see the country divided into French- and English-speaking regions. Residents of the restive southwest and the far north also raised protest banners and blocked a major road in the English-speaking region of West

Cameroon to demand greater autonomy. The protests come one month after two English-speaking regions went to the polls, where residents -- who are roughly 10 percent of the population of over 22 million -- voted to reject the new unity government in the wake of a 2015 vote that consolidated power in the French-speaking central region. Members of West Cameroon's English-speaking region have since said that they are unable to get basic services such as electricity, water and hospitals -- and that the government has failed to provide the aid they need. Critics of the two regions fear the planned March 10 referendum to reunite the largely Francophone nation of central and western Africa's most populous country will divide Cameroon into two nations -- even though President Paul Biya was elected for life in office and the regions have their own governments. Opposition groups have accused Biya of trying to consolidate control of the regions in preparation for the vote, which may result in the creation of a new state -- home to millions of people -- that would break from a country with its own army, customs service and passport. Attendees at Sunday's protest in the north and south of the English-speaking regions held banners reading "Save our pride" and "Corruption, deception and lies" -- and sang songs and chanted for secession. "We will not allow our brothers and sisters to be robbed of their rights," said David Ekane Edou, the president of the union of citizens of the two regions of West Cameroon. Many of the protesters in the popular tourist destination of the "Damerica" region of the English-speaking north have also been impacted by the lack of basic services, and are angry with the government for not taking the region seriously. "We are still living in the Stone Age," said a 23-year-old Anglophone man known only by his nickname, Alirio, as he stood in a crowd of protesters in a popular market. The protesters in the "Damerica" region
