Supplementation of vitamin K2 in the treatment of hepatic encephalopathy: a single-dose, randomized, placebo-controlled, double-blind trial. Vitamin K(2) (menaquinone-4, MK-4) is effective in reducing the recurrence of varices in patients with liver disease. However, there is no data on its potential effect on hepatic encephalopathy (HE). This randomized, double-blind, placebo-controlled, single-dose trial was performed to compare the effect of MK-4 (n = 19; 3000 microg/d) and placebo (n = 20) on the pharmacokinetics of hepatic encephalopathy markers (glutamate, γ -amino-butyric acid) in patients with cirrhosis with previous overt HE. Glutamate and γ -amino-butyric acid levels were measured in plasma, cerebral spinal fluid (CSF) and urine. The differences in the glutamate concentrations between baseline and 4 h after dosing were significantly lower in the MK-4 group, both in plasma and CSF, compared with placebo. The difference in γ -amino-butyric acid levels between baseline and 4 h after dosing was significantly lower in the MK-4 group than in the placebo group. After 16 weeks of follow-up, MK-4 was associated with a significantly higher number of patients who attained minimal HE resolution than placebo. In addition, MK-4 was associated with a significantly higher quality of life and symptoms of HE according to the visual analog scale and psychometric hepatic encephalopathy score. MK-4 was effective in a single dose of 3000 microg in the resolution of minimal HE in patients with cirrhosis. MK-4 may be a useful adjunct in the treatment 648931e174
