This is a FREE service provided by the Library of.Q: How to split vectors by number of entries I have a structure which contains a vector and a string struct Model { vector model_vector; string model_string; } They are both populated from a JSON-File via a std::getline. size_t index = 0; for(auto itr : model->model_vector) { cin >> model->model_vector[index++]; } cin >> model->model_string; The vector contains different Models and each Model has different strings. If there are more models in the JSON-File then the first Model should be stored (as we want the model, but not the string) and the second model should contain the first and the third model the second and the last model should be the third etc. (like the vector). Is there a way to check how many entries a vector has and split that vector into multiple ones (of the same size)? A: To get the length of the vector, use std::size_t size = std::vector::size(); To split it up, you can use std::vector v = std::vector().assign(size); std::vector s; std::vector
