Portal hypertension, either prehepatic (if the pressure increases in the portal vein) or posthepatic (if the pressure increases in the hepatic veins), is responsible for a number of clinical manifestations that depend on the location and degree of increased portal pressure, and on the type of underlying circulatory or metabolic disturbance. The development of ascites, varices, hepatopathy or gastrointestinal bleeding, may be accompanied by dilatation of the portal vein, which may progress to complete occlusion and subsequent Budd-Chiari syndrome. Patients with prehepatic portal hypertension usually present with ascites, upper gastrointestinal bleeding or varices. Patients with posthepatic portal hypertension present with ascites, gastric bleeding, hepatopathy and splenomegaly. It has been suggested that endoscopy should be performed in all patients with cirrhosis, regardless of the presence or absence of symptoms, and in patients with posthepatic portal hypertension as soon as there is a clinically significant degree of cirrhosis with portal hypertension. The presence
