Socrates (1937) noted the "failure of systems" as one of the more universal issues in making people "come to life" when "talking with one another" that is, he defined the "conditions of appeal." Thus, we propose that audience involvement might be made easier by addressing the audience's needs and concerns in certain types of situations, especially when performing professionally in contexts that tend to contain "direct or indirect appeal" to the audience (Lee, 1990). In this article, we further focus on the type of situation in which an audience is involved: the conference setting. We explore the connections between speaker situations and audience involvement for events at four different types of conferences, including research conferences, social science conferences, professional conferences, and educational conferences.`
