This invention relates to methods of producing high-strength, low-alloy, thin strip cast products. More particularly, this invention relates to a method for producing a high-strength, low-alloy, thin strip cast product with superior properties in terms of quality, yield, and strength. It is known to form metal strip by continuous casting processes, particularly continuous casting processes using twin-belt casting techniques. Typically, a slurry comprised of solid material, such as, a molten metal, is poured onto a casting surface, such as, a roll, belt, or casting table, and a flow of metal is formed which then progresses over the casting surface. The thickness of the metal strip produced by a twin-belt process is usually adjusted by adjusting the distance between the casting surfaces. At present, it is possible to produce metal strip with a thickness of less than 0.02 inches and of a suitable width. Increasing demands for metal strip having even thinner thicknesses and widths require new processes and systems that provide higher production rates, increased quality, and increased yields. One process that has been considered to reduce the thickness of metal strip is referred to as continuous metal-remelting ("CMR"). In CMR, a slurry of a metal is continuously poured onto a casting surface, such as, a roll, belt, or casting table. A flow of molten metal then forms which then progresses over the casting surface. In some CMR processes, a reactive material, such as, scrap, is continuously mixed into the molten metal at a location downstream of the casting surface. Examples of this type of CMR are described in U.S. Pat. No. 4,869,104 to Stone; and U.S. Pat. No. 5
