rm 633.Effect of selenium supplementation on glutathione and biochemical components of oxidative stress in erythrocytes of untreated and ionizing radiation-exposed mice. The present study investigated the effect of selenium (Se) supplementation on glutathione (GSH), lipid peroxidation (LPO), protein carbonylation (PC) and antioxidant enzymes (CAT and SOD) of erythrocytes after

exposure of mice to chronic dose of X-rays (0, 2, 4, 6 and 10 Gy). Se was supplemented in drinking water at a concentration of 0.5 mg/kg b.w. for 30 days. The data showed that radiation treatment caused a marked increase in the levels of GSH, LPO and PC, as well as decrease in CAT and SOD activity in erythrocytes of mice. In contrast, the Se supplementation caused a significant decrease in LPO level with a corresponding increase in CAT activity and SOD activity. This protective effect of Se was, however, more significant in mice exposed to a higher dose of X-rays. These results suggest that, Se could be used as a dietary supplement, and that its effect on ionizing radiation-induced erythrocyte oxidative stress could be more effective at higher doses of radiation. Codon usage bias in a trypanosomatid parasite and its implications for genetic diversity studies. In this study, an attempt has been made to understand the correlation of codon usage bias of Trypanosoma cruzi (Kinetoplastida: Trypanosomatidae) with the previously determined base composition at the third codon position of its 18S rDNA gene.

The overall codon usage bias in this trypanosomatid parasite has been found to be high, which is in accordance with previous studies. Average
