Peter Hohland, who is 38, turned himself in Sunday afternoon and faces a charge of first-degree murder. Saskatchewan RCMP said Friday that the woman's body was found in the basement of the family home in the town of McBride about two weeks after she reported him for cheating on her. She had taken her 10-month-old daughter, police say, and left the house. "Peter was seen by a neighbour walking out of the house towards the neighbour's house in McBride on the morning that the body was discovered, so obviously he knew what had happened before the body was found," RCMP Sgt. Ryan Valiquette said. "We believe that he had been communicating with her after she left his house." RCMP say Hohland eventually picked her up from a McBride motel and took her to a farm. The couple married in 2011, and had three children together. "He was always a caring and loving husband and father," RCMP said. "His kids miss him very much." He has a history of arrests for other infractions, including prostitution, mischief and growing marijuana, but police said there was no indication he planned to harm his wife. Officers are still trying to identify the woman they believe was his other lover. Otello syndrome--atypical features. The Otello syndrome (Online Mendelian Inheritance in Man Number 139,040), or a variant of Hennekam syndrome, is a recessive disorder characterized by hyperplasia of mesenteric and other adipose tissue. Clinical manifestations include acanthosis nigricans, facial hypertrophy, hyperinsulinism, growth retardation, short stature, and skeletal anomalies. The diagnosis of Otello syndrome is usually straightforward. This paper reports atypical features not previously described in the literature.
