I got the idea from Sam from “Vegan Yack Attack” (the best vegan recipe blog on the web). To read more about how I made it, click here. Let’s talk ice cream. It’s not exactly a time-consuming process... but definitely a very labor intensive one. You must chill your custard to a specific point... usually around 26 or so degrees. After that, you need to make the crust... which is a joy-to-make, then you need to make the filling by adding all the ingredients... and finally you need to make the actual ice cream. We need all of these ingredients lined up and ready to go as we whisk together the egg and sugar. The good news is, once you get the ice cream making process down, it’s pretty easy to do over and over again. When we made our ice cream, we used some store bought ice cream base, and some xanthan gum (which is a fantastic thickening agent, that you can get at most stores these days). This is the ice cream base we used. The great thing about the store bought base is that it’s vegan, dairy-free, gluten-free and refined sugar free. It also has the consistency of soft-serve ice cream, which makes making it easier. What is the ideal ice cream? It’s hard to say since a lot depends on the depth of your flavor profile, the texture, the size of the ice cream, and the way you want to serve it. But in my opinion, there are several things that make for an ideal flavor profile and texture. I think the ideal flavor and texture of a pie ice cream is a little bit of molasses and perhaps a little bit of a pie crust or a cookie. That said, if you’re going with a more savory ice cream, you can toss in some Parmesan cheese or bacon bits for texture. The base of this pie ice cream is a dark vegan chocolate ice cream. But in order to add some fruitiness, I kept c6a93da74d
