Winning the Money Game - Strategies for Achieving Financial Freedom. 33 Chapter 1 - Getting Started in Business .A scientist at the University of East Anglia's School of Biological Sciences was hoping that a joint exercise with two other institutions on Blackford Hill, south of Cambridge, would be the start of a new chapter in the biosphere watch's history. The biosphere watch was set up in 1996 as a way of monitoring the environmental impact of humanity on Earth, the impacts of which continue to be felt as we hurtle towards the expected date of habitable planet overshoot. From a science point of view, the biosphere watch focuses on four major areas: air, land, water and carbon cycling. The site allows users to view the data from the biosphere watch in a number of ways, such as the interactive map, which allows users to see not only what impact humans have had on ecosystems around the world, but also to pick out which parts of the world are suffering the most damage. "We are telling people about the harm we are doing to the climate, to the oceans, to the atmosphere, to the land, to the health of our communities," said Brian Cox. "We are tracking the global impacts of humans and over the years we've noticed that certain pollutants are moving up the food chain and have a devastating effect on the environment." But by focusing on the impact we are having on the planet, the biosphere watch is not calling for any cuts in human population. In fact, it is pointed out that the more people there are on the planet, the more damage we are doing to the environment. Cox said: "[There is] an exponential increase in the amount of animals on the planet, the pollution of the environment, so we can't ignore our impact. We have shown that for every 1.5 degree of 79a2804d6b
