But a recent experiment from Google shows how a mobile app can blend into the desktop to create a seamless experience. Of course, it's not like the app in question can operate within the same screen space as a PC app, but Google did something a little different. According to a statement from Google , "Advertising on the desktop web isn't really a great alternative to native apps." It makes sense when you consider that usually a PC browser has limited access to an individual user's information and its particular use patterns. Plus, a desktop web advertising solution is often incompatible in terms of design and so forth. But the statement was expanded upon by the search giant in a recent experiment not involving mobile apps or third-party services, but rather a native mobile app that was taken to the desktop. As it turns out, Google's assertion was wrong, to a point, since a mobile app can be a lot better than a desktop solution.
