This is really just a time saver. You have a collection of iPad apps that you use to work. They're synced to the cloud to access a large library of photos, and multiple apps allow you to work on the files simultaneously. All of Photoshop has been completely overhauled and updated for the iPad. There are fully featured versions of all the standard tools you would expect to find in the desktop version of the program, and there's a powerful collection of creative tools built into the app. An exciting addition to the tools in Photoshop CC is the new video editing feature. It is still not perfect but it is certainly the most powerful and fluid video editing application you can find on any iOS platform, and it is one of the first apps you should try. The ability to receive a comment on a photo in the form of an interactive portion of the image is really quite powerful. Reviewers can see the image open in Photoshop, the toolset if it's a tool they use, and they can see what comments are made against the image. This kind of commenting can really drive the thought process of the reviewing community. In addition to an inline review mode, Photoshop CC now has a new desktop sharing feature. This is only found on the desktop version of the app, and it has a notable speed increase over the iMovie app's sharing tool that is available for the iPad. Some apps that Adobe tried to improve on the iPad Pro that worked very well were not very sort efficient, with apps like Photoshop. I found that burning through the menus and layers became a real chore with the streamlined editing process found on the iPad Pro.

Blending options are also great ways to remove places and over-saturate colors to create a very unique look. In the next example, we changed the background color to white with blending options for the text layer. In case the colors aren't quite right, we wanted to create a warm look. We agreed on the color yellow-orange and darkened the text to get the heated look. Note that in the Photoshop workspace, we dragged the text layer onto the new background (white), then we closed the window. The foreground color orange is separated from the background and blended to create the orange look. If you see a finished outcome where you don't quite like the final look, you can go in and change the color, change the opacity, or even go back to the layers and change the entire look.
