The acute form of pancreatitis is initiated when exocrine cells in the exocrine part of the pancreas are killed by factors from the intralobular vascular system. Sustained inflammation of the exocrine pancreas is also thought to be responsible for the chronic form of the disease. However, the mechanisms of cell death in the pancreas are still unclear, and the actual extent of necrocytosis in the exocrine pancreas is still a matter of discussion. The acute form of the disease is characterised by massive destruction of acinar cells, whereas the chronic form of the disease is characterised by fibrosis of the exocrine pancreas. Necrosis of acinar cells seems to be the primary cause of the acute form, but a loss of acinar cells that is either apoptotic or not apoptotic has been demonstrated in chronic pancreatitis. One of the most obvious changes in chronic pancreatitis is fibrosis and its formation is probably caused by a loss of acinar cells. Necrosis or apoptosis may be responsible for the progression of the disease. Cytokines seem to be important in the progression of both forms of the disease. Proinflammatory cytokines are responsible for the exocrine inflammation and the formation of pancreatic stellate cells in the chronic form of the disease, and probably also the progression of the disease. Interleukin-6, a pleiotropic cytokine, is probably produced by both acinar cells and stellate cells of the exocrine pancreas. The cytokine IL-6 is probably involved in the generation of the acute form of the disease and also in the development of pancreatic stellate cells.Abstract: Innovative capabilities for stably expressing
