To assess the burden and needs among patients with spinal cord injury (SCI) or multiple sclerosis (MS) and their relatives, and analyze correlates of burden and needs of the patients and their family members. A cross-sectional exploratory study was conducted in northern Portugal, from October to December 2014. The sample included 18 patients with SCI or MS, 18 family members and 18 controls from the community. The relatives and the patients completed questionnaires on socio-demographic and clinical characteristics, perceived impact of the illness, and burden and needs. The patient-reported burden was higher among the relatives than controls (p = 0.033), mainly due to the SCI population, and notably among those with a family member with same illness. The relatives also reported higher levels of burden than the patients, while the latter reported more needs and lower satisfaction with the support received. Results were similar for the relatives, but only a tendency was observed among patients. The relatives of patients with chronic diseases, such as SCI and MS, usually demonstrate higher levels of burden than controls. Both patients and relatives report higher needs than satisfaction, and are in need of more patient-centred care, both in clinical and psycho-social aspects./* * Copyright (c) 2012, Oracle and/or its affiliates.
