It may be better for society, some argue, to have a world in which certain words are not found -- especially words we can agree have no positive value. Twitter even has its own way of making words disappear from the site. Another way to do this would be for a major company to ensure that certain search terms don't show up in search results. Doing this, of course, runs the risk of stifling the public's right to information. But, you might ask, if we stop allowing certain search terms to be found, what happens when something untrue turns up? It turns out that there's a precedent for stopping untrue results from showing up: the Book of Exodus, of course, commands God to strike dead any "maledictory idolatry" that shows up in Israel's desert (verse 21). That's right, in the Book of Exodus, the mainstream narrative insists God struck down untrue words that appeared on the desert sands. If enough of us call out bad actors, we can make sure untrue things are no longer said or done or seen. So, is there a way for a major internet service provider (ISP) to intervene in the search results produced by the major search engines? Could an ISP block search results if it believes they are libelous? I tend to think that the answer is "yes," but the recent blog post by Cloudflare CEO Matthew Prince seems to contend that

ISPs ought to have that power. For example, we could do something as simple as allow Google to be obligated to provide search results that does not endorse or promote certain
